MyBarrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
MyBarrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
There’s a stretch of freeway, where the 405 and 22 intersect at the edge of Garden Grove, that often smells like dirt and cabbage. Hugging the freeway in plain sight, looking south, is farmland. It’s a secretive place without signs or roadside produce stands – the land is part of the US Naval Weapons Station in Seal Beach. No barrier stands between the busy freeway bottleneck and the open rows of crops. Nevertheless, farm plots are leased out and groups of fieldworkers can occasionally be spotted hunched over the produce – sometimes cabbage, sometimes strawberries, maybe pumpkins. It’s hard to tell at 60 miles an hour what grows there, but you can always spot the workers. Low, crouched figures grouped together, wrapped in bright clothing that gives them life against the brown and green earth. Not far away, a truck or a school bus that dropped them off; a few dreary shacks in the distance. Their lives are entirely anonymous to the thousands of cars buzzing past; their hands will have dug into and picked over acres of earth before rush hour.

On the other side of the narrow freeway, looking north, a tall, thick concrete wall shelters the golfers at Old Ranch Country Club. Perhaps they, too, stand out against their manicured grass, only you can never see them. Instead, a couple long rows of bizarre cloned paintings in gold frames hang along the wall – highway beautification at its most functional: energizingly colorful, floral, and geometric, the portrait-sized paintings are a cheery, meaningless distraction from the usual traffic. In Orange County, bright colors in public spaces tend to exist in controlled, confined doses. Colors aren’t usually used as thought-provoking tools.

Emigdio Vasquez created artwork that challenged Orange County’s more prominent narrative of wealthy beachside neighborhoods. He painted the brown bodies and brown histories that defined our earliest communities and economy. Having grown up in the heart of Orange, the son of Mexican immigrants, in a barrio populated by families who worked in citrus fields and packinghouses, Vasquez knew Orange County in possibly its most pure form. After a brief stint as a construction laborer, he spent roughly forty years here as a professional artist. He was an emerging artist during the height of the Chicano Movement in the 1970s; his large body of work includes numerous easel paintings and over thirty public murals that strongly identified with the movement’s emphasis on workers’ rights, social equality, and indigenist ideologies.

“WHEN I WAS IN HIGH SCHOOL, THE ART I WAS TAUGHT HAD NOTHING TO DO WITH MY LIFE HERE. SO I DECIDED TO CREATE A BODY OF WORK THAT WAS PERSONAL AND RELEVANT TO MY BARRIO.”

Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

INTRODUCTION

Natalie Lawler
Vasquez produced much of the local art history that Orange County should be known for and should protect. It is with this perspective that Chapman University, in conjunction with the Getty Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA initiative, is proud to present the exhibition, El Proletariado de Aztlán, in the Guggenheim Gallery, in conjunction with the Getty Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA initiative. We hope to initiate discourse not only about Vasquez's prolific career, but also about the larger political impact of his decided Chicano/a-centered murals. Vasquez plastered color – both physical and social – onto our sprawling suburban Orange County landscapes. Countypside, buildings and houses tend to be a limited spectrum of beige, grays, pastels, and desaturated hues. To paint vibrant, vivid life onto that rigorous beige is a bold act. And it's important to note that Vasquez didn't exaggerate color. A self-identified social-realist painter, he did not embellish the present or dwell in sugary nostalgia – he painted what was immediate and real.

The mural that serves as the centerpiece for our exhibition, El Proletariado de Aztlán, is a short walk from Chapman's campus in Orange: leave behind the titanium white and ochre brick buildings of main campus, into the rows of low-slung craftsman houses; after a few blocks of homes in slate blue or stale rose and chalk white, turn right on Cypress Street and look left. On the side of a one-story residential triples is the eight-foot-tall head of an Aztec warrior, long turquoise quetzal feathers trailing his helmet. A woman carrying a bushel of lettuce, a miner, farm workers in the field and on strike, pachucos, a lowrider, and friends and family from the barrio are all magnified across the 64-foot-long wall.

The mural has stood there since Vasquez painted it in 1979, a source of pride for the Orange Barrio. After more than thirty years of exposure to sun, rain, wind, and car exhaust, Chapman University – who purchased the property in 2013 – worked with the Orange Barrio Historical Society, Vasquez and his son, Higgy, to restore the mural back to vibrant color.

Our exhibition, spread across two gallery spaces, uses this early Vasquez mural as a guidepost to place his work in contemporary and historical contexts. Identifying as a bridge shared by the Orange community and Chapman University, the exhibition explores the emergence of Chicano/a politics, identity, and artistic sensibilities in the North Orange County region, and in the Guggenheim Gallery, Vasquez's easel paintings connect to the language of contemporary artists who emphasize physical and social – onto our sprawling suburban Orange County landscapes. Countywide, buildings and houses tend to be a limited spectrum of beige, grays, pastels, and desaturated hues. To paint vibrant, vivid life onto that rigorous beige is a bold act. And it's important to note that Vasquez didn't exaggerate color. A self-identified social-realist painter, he did not embellish the present or dwell in sugary nostalgia – he painted what was immediate and real.

Our exhibition, spread across two gallery spaces, uses this early Vasquez mural as a guidepost to place his work in contemporary and historical contexts. Identifying as a bridge shared by the Orange community and Chapman University, the exhibition explores the emergence of Chicano/a politics, identity, and artistic sensibilities in the North Orange County region, and in the Guggenheim Gallery, Vasquez's easel paintings connect to the language of contemporary artists who emphasize physical and social – onto our sprawling suburban Orange County landscapes. Countywide, buildings and houses tend to be a limited spectrum of beige, grays, pastels, and desaturated hues. To paint vibrant, vivid life onto that rigorous beige is a bold act. And it's important to note that Vasquez didn't exaggerate color. A self-identified social-realist painter, he did not embellish the present or dwell in sugary nostalgia – he painted what was immediate and real.

El Proletariado de Aztlán, is a short walk from Chapman's campus in Orange: leave behind the titanium white and ochre brick buildings of main campus, into the rows of low-slung craftsman houses; after a few blocks of homes in slate blue or stale rose and chalk white, turn right on Cypress Street and look left. On the side of a one-story residential triples is the eight-foot-tall head of an Aztec warrior, long turquoise quetzal feathers trailing his helmet. A woman carrying a bushel of lettuce, a miner, farm workers in the field and on strike, pachucos, a lowrider, and friends and family from the barrio are all magnified across the 64-foot-long wall.

The mural has stood there since Vasquez painted it in 1979, a source of pride for the Orange Barrio. After more than thirty years of exposure to sun, rain, wind, and car exhaust, Chapman University – who purchased the property in 2013 – worked with the Orange Barrio Historical Society, Vasquez and his son, Higgy, to restore the mural back to vibrant color.

Our exhibition, spread across two gallery spaces, uses this early Vasquez mural as a guidepost to place his work in contemporary and historical contexts. Identifying as a bridge shared by the Orange community and Chapman University, the exhibition explores the emergence of Chicano/a politics, identity, and artistic sensibilities in the North Orange County region, and in the Guggenheim Gallery, Vasquez's easel paintings connect to the language of contemporary artists who emphasize physical and social – onto our sprawling suburban Orange County landscapes. Countywide, buildings and houses tend to be a limited spectrum of beige, grays, pastels, and desaturated hues. To paint vibrant, vivid life onto that rigorous beige is a bold act. And it's important to note that Vasquez didn't exaggerate color. A self-identified social-realist painter, he did not embellish the present or dwell in sugary nostalgia – he painted what was immediate and real.

The mural that serves as the centerpiece for our exhibition, El Proletariado de Aztlán, is a short walk from Chapman's campus in Orange: leave behind the titanium white and ochre brick buildings of main campus, into the rows of low-slung craftsman houses; after a few blocks of homes in slate blue or stale rose and chalk white, turn right on Cypress Street and look left. On the side of a one-story residential triples is the eight-foot-tall head of an Aztec warrior, long turquoise quetzal feathers trailing his helmet. A woman carrying a bushel of lettuce, a miner, farm workers in the field and on strike, pachucos, a lowrider, and friends and family from the barrio are all magnified across the 64-foot-long wall.

The mural has stood there since Vasquez painted it in 1979, a source of pride for the Orange Barrio. After more than thirty years of exposure to sun, rain, wind, and car exhaust, Chapman University – who purchased the property in 2013 – worked with the Orange Barrio Historical Society, Vasquez and his son, Higgy, to restore the mural back to vibrant color.

Our exhibition, spread across two gallery spaces, uses this early Vasquez mural as a guidepost to place his work in contemporary and historical contexts. Identifying as a bridge shared by the Orange community and Chapman University, the exhibition explores the emergence of Chicano/a politics, identity, and artistic sensibilities in the North Orange County region, and in the Guggenheim Gallery, Vasquez's easel paintings connect to the language of contemporary artists who emphasize physical and social – onto our sprawling suburban Orange County landscapes. Countywide, buildings and houses tend to be a limited spectrum of beige, grays, pastels, and desaturated hues. To paint vibrant, vivid life onto that rigorous beige is a bold act. And it's important to note that Vasquez didn't exaggerate color. A self-identified social-realist painter, he did not embellish the present or dwell in sugary nostalgia – he painted what was immediate and real.
our students and campus community to explore local neighborhoods and bring neighboring communities to explore ours. In a time of increasing digitization and virtual experiences, a walk through the barrio or into a gallery is an opportunity to create a stronger connection, a gesture of acknowledgement. Murals demand physical presence – they’re framed by rooftops, stairways, brick walls, garbage cans, high-rise windows, barbed wire, crown moulding, and fences. Visually and physically, they reflect the communities and people who surround them. They transform the surfaces they’re painted on, creating spaces that engage and educate rather than corral – social environments from tangible ones.

* * *

When I walk onto Chapman’s campus every morning, little golf carts are zooming around, each one filled with different tools for their drivers’ tasks: electrical wiring, buckets of paint, drills and hardware, boxes of mail, catering supplies, bulging trash bags. Landscapers are usually winding down, tying up big canvas bundles of grass and clippings. Construction workers are grouped around their big lunchboxes filled with homemade meals. They operate this campus before, during, and after business hours. They are helpful, humble, wonderful people, and the only ones here who wear uniforms, their names usually stitched on their chests. This exhibition would not have been possible without their daily dedication.
Appositely, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o identity in Orange County has been a project that has drawn on enthusiasm and support far beyond the community of Chapman University. The opportunity to join over 70 prestigious institutions in the ambitious Getty Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA initiative has supported us in forming partnerships and fostering friendships throughout our geographic region. Our own project has grown far beyond the temporal outcome of physical exhibitions, towards critically developing our own permanent collections to more fully embrace the contributions of Latin American artists to modern and contemporary art in Southern California.

The genesis of the project My Barrio occurred in the Orange Barrio itself. In 2013 Chapman University undertook the restoration of a mural by the renowned Chicano artist Emigdio Vasquez. Fittingly, the restoration was skillfully executed by the artist’s son, Higgy Vasquez. We are immensely grateful to the members of the Vasquez family for their continued investment of time, energy and expertise, and also for their generosity and friendship towards Chapman University. We acknowledge Higgy Vasquez, who will also paint a new mural on campus; the filmmaker and director Katherine Bowers, who will document the process of completing the new mural; Emigdio Vasquez’s daughter Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill and Steve Tuthill.

My Barrio has been an opportunity to trace issues central to Vasquez’s historic Chicano murals into the present day. We are tremendously grateful to the contemporary artists represented in the Guggenheim Gallery exhibition for their recognition of our vision, and for generously working closely with our curators. We extend very special thanks to Ken Gonzales-Day, Ramiro Gomez, Cynthia Herrera, Dulce Soledad Barra, Patrick Martinez, Shizu Saldamando, Ana Serrano, and Alejandro Sanchez; in addition we would like to recognize Julian Bermudez, Charlie James Gallery, and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles.

As a laboratory for student learning, the Chapman University Art Department Collections nurtures the development of student scholars who train with Collections staff and contribute valuable research. While many students have participated in this project, we want to especially thank the extraordinary young scholars Jessica Bosinski and Manon Wogahn who consistently went the extra mile to ensure that multiple aspects of this project were accomplished in a polished and professional manner. Their insightful essays form a central part of this catalog. We also extend our thanks to Cailin Grantham, Tanya Leon, Alison Pinto, Garret Hill, Katie Peck and Lauren Ross.

In line with our mission, we look for every opportunity to integrate exhibitions with the academic curriculum. In this instance students from Professor Denise Johnson’s course on the Chicano Art Movement supplied research and visual records of Emigdio Vasquez’s murals: Kelsey Anderson; Haley Bergeesen; Vincent Carolyn Foster; Brooke Fessler; Olivia Hossein; Elise Jacobsen; Jennifer Johnson; Ellen Too; Briana Leonard; McKenna Robbie; Michael Stavertoni; Cailin Tooman; and Manon Wogahn. We extend special thanks to Stephen Tyler and Rachel Wiegmann for their enthusiastic efforts to document all existing murals for the app and this catalog, as well as hunting down information on demolished murals, and soliciting to record the exact locations of these works (some of which are behind buildings, enclosed by fences, and at sites without addresses).
The multi-disciplinary nature of My Barrio has led to collaboration with a great many of our colleagues throughout Chapman University. First and foremost, we thank President Denise Stupe and Provost Glenn Pfeiffer for their continued support and encouragement. The germ of inspiration for this project came from the talented team of Natalie Lawler, Curator of the Art Collections, and Denise Johnson and Wendy Salmond of the Department of Art, and Karen Lloyd of Stony Brook University. The project's ambitious scope and its inclusivity is testament to their commitment and vision. We gratefully acknowledge funding from the following sources: the Ellingson Family; the Phyliss and Ross Escalette Permanent Art Collection Endowment; Chapman University Office of Undergraduate Research and Creative Activity; Chapman University Diversity and Inclusion Education Curricular Innovation Award; Wilkinson College of Arts, Humanities, and Social Sciences; University Advancement; the Guggenheim Gallery, Wilkinson College; Chapman Research Arts Social Sciences Humanities (CRASsH) and Building Undergraduate Research Networks (BURN).

As Director of Chapman University's Art Collections, I would like to specially acknowledge the outstanding contributions of the curatorial team. Their fastidious research, energy, and generosity as mentors to students shine throughout this project. Very special thanks are due to Project Director Natalie Lawler for her extraordinary ability to galvanize and inspire so many people to become involved and contribute. Denise Johnson's curatorial expertise and sensitive perception has brought to light connections between the past and present that we hope provoke and surprise. And, much gratitude to Marcus Herse for his keen curatorial eye, design acumen, and ability to achieve tasks discounted as not possible.

Lindsay Shen, Director, Chapman University Art Collections

Natalie Lawler, Director, Chapman University Art Collections, and Project Director
Denise Johnson, Curator, Chapman University Art Collections, and Project Director
Marcus Herse, Director, Guggenheim Gallery, and Curator

The Emigdio Vasquez mural on which this project rests dates from 1979. We decided that commissioning a new mural for campus would be a fitting tribute to and continuation of the legacy of Chicano murals in Orange County. This could never have been achieved without a generous gift from the Ellingson Family, which allowed us to commission Vasquez's son, Higgy Vasquez to create a mural celebrating Chapman University's rich history. We acknowledge the following for their part in realizing this goal: the Chapman University Campus Planning team of Kris Olsen, Ken Murai, Kati Byrne, Rick Turner, Ed Blachford, Vincent Medina and Vince "Buzz" Farmer of Facilities; and special consultant Jose Loza.
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ, NUESTRA EXPERIENCIA EN EL SIGLO VEINTE, 1980
of long dilapidated tenement houses used to shelter orange pickers (and providing little beyond a roof overhead) who worked in nearby orange groves or at the Villa Park Orchards Association Packinghouse.4 Formed in 1924 by a men’s Bible study group to assist the farm workers,5 and funded by several nearby churches,6 the Friendly Center next door was host to numerous jamaicas (street fairs), weddings, holiday celebrations, and school gatherings, proving an important hub that nurtured community and wove strong neighborhood bonds. Just steps away from this center, Vasquez’s mural is spatially connected to, and contextualized by a valued source of food, friendship, and spiritual sustenance to residents of the Orange Barrio.

As such, El Proletariado de Aztlán is at once a striking offer of gratitude, and a resilient testimony to the very community that had long gathered at the Friendly Center’s steps. The mural offers a lush panorama to the center’s northern windows, and fittingly, community bonds are the foundation of its subject matter. Beginning at El Proletariado’s western corner, mythic Aztlán flourishes and is overseen by a majestic Aztec warrior whose profile is progressively repeated in two successive archetypes representing dignified men who appear to be just a generation apart. As the ancient horizon proceeds forward, figures referencing the artist’s life story7 emerge like mountains from the soil and are greeted by farm labor organizer, Cesar Chavez who flanks the eastern corner of the mural with a welcoming smile.

The mural’s eastern wall, which faces Cypress Street, is punctuated by a warm portrait of Hank Luna of the Friendly Center. In the scene that unfolds around him, the representation of Chicano/a history shifts to the modern era via a call to strike on a red banner emblazoned with the word, HUELGA and the stylized eagle that by the time of Vasquez’s painting had become a symbol of the Chicano/a movement. A nostalgic scene depicting the Cypress Street Market of long dilapidated tenement houses used to shelter orange pickers (and providing little beyond a roof overhead) who worked in nearby orange groves or at the Villa Park Orchards Association Packinghouse.4 Formed in 1924 by a men’s Bible study group to assist the farm workers,5 and funded by several nearby churches,6 the Friendly Center next door was host to numerous jamaicas (street fairs), weddings, holiday celebrations, and school gatherings, proving an important hub that nurtured community and wove strong neighborhood bonds. Just steps away from this center, Vasquez’s mural is spatially connected to, and contextualized by a valued source of food, friendship, and spiritual sustenance to residents of the Orange Barrio.

As such, El Proletariado de Aztlán is at once a striking offer of gratitude, and a resilient testimony to the very community that had long gathered at the Friendly Center’s steps. The mural offers a lush panorama to the center’s northern windows, and fittingly, community bonds are the foundation of its subject matter. Beginning at El Proletariado’s western corner, mythic Aztlán flourishes and is overseen by a majestic Aztec warrior whose profile is progressively repeated in two successive archetypes representing dignified men who appear to be just a generation apart. As the ancient horizon proceeds forward, figures referencing the artist’s life story7 emerge like mountains from the soil and are greeted by farm labor organizer, Cesar Chavez who flanks the eastern corner of the mural with a welcoming smile.

The mural’s eastern wall, which faces Cypress Street, is punctuated by a warm portrait of Hank Luna of the Friendly Center. In the scene that unfolds around him, the representation of Chicano/a history shifts to the modern era via a call to strike on a red banner emblazoned with the word, HUELGA and the stylized eagle that by the time of Vasquez’s painting had become a symbol of the Chicano/a movement. A nostalgic scene depicting the Cypress Street Market

The Spanish term barrio means neighborhood and speaks to familiar, well loved spaces. While it can sometimes refer to a “slum,” it is more often used neutrally to refer to a space that is part of a larger whole. As in the case of the Orange Barrio within Orange, CA, this usage implicitly acknowledges groups who have been pushed to the margins, and the cultural ties that flourish in those border spaces as a result. Reflecting this, for those in the American southwest who have ever called a barrio “home,” the term conjures grateful stories, comforting past times, and rites of passage speaking to shared stories that are lovingly protected. Nonetheless, when spoken by English speakers (Anglo, Chicana/o and otherwise) in the broader context of the US, barrio takes on a pejorative tone, connoting a neglected neighborhood full of unsavory characters and dangerous corners. For these users, the term evokes ghettos,2 high rates of poverty, decay, and crime.

Similarly, the word Chicana/o is persistently complicated entanglements reveal unsettling, and unsettling, political terrain. The origins of Chicana/o are not known, but likely relate to the Nahual term Nahuali and is a play on the “sh” pronunciation of the “x” by the Conquistadors. In use for decades, by the 1960s the term had been widely adopted by activist groups to assert a positive identity and a sense of proud heritage for Americans of Mexican descent. However, Chicana/o has never been a term that Mexican Americans have collectively ascribed to.

Given these contested meanings, that Emigdio Vasquez painted El Proletariado de Aztlán in 1979 on the side of a garage in the Orange Barrio, is particularly poignant. The garage was part of a complex constructed on the site
Such an ideology was likely bolstered through a collaboration in 1974 with Sergio O'Cadiz on the now famous MEChA Mural, History and Evolution of the Chicano in the United States, for Santa Ana College's Neally Library, that coincided with hard won achievements by Chicana/o student organizers in Southern California high schools and universities. Through these, Emigdio Vasquez leapt confidently to his largest known mural, Memories of the Past, Images of the Present (1978). Painted on a tall, open wall on the southern side of the Ibero-America Market, the mural faces a shady retreat known as Little People's Park. In-and-of-itself, the park is significant to the character of the neighborhood, as it was established when residents appealed to the city of Anaheim to improve a vacant lot deemed disposable. As well, the mural work marks Vasquez's first public commission. Again, understanding place proves essential to appreciating Vasquez's message. The Ibero-America Market, like the Friendly Center in the Orange Barrio, was an anchor for Anaheim's Penguin City Barrio. Specializing in the foodstuffs essential to Mexican dishes, Chicanas/os had to rely on smaller neighborhood grocers such as the Ibero-America Market to avoid open hostilities at national grocery chains that did not stock so-called "ethnic" ingredients that were staples to barrio diets. Vasquez painted Memories of the Past, Images of the Present to commemorate a 1970 riot that occurred in Little People's Park after police responded to a call concerning shots fired by arresting a heckling bystander. Tensions erupted, and police wantonly beat passersby, then entered nearby homes to randomly mace, beat, and arrest Chicana/o residents. Vasquez responds to the violence of the riot with the lessons of resistance. In Memories of the Past, Images of the Present, we see the artist develop a strategic use of historical tableau to define Chicana/o identity. The resulting chronicle of Chicana/o history is a narrative for the people, by the people.

Beginning with heroes from the 1906 Magonista Rebellion, and the 1910 Mexican Revolution, Vasquez depicts indigenous peasants, striking farm workers, and contemporary residents in a photo realistic style that coaxes empathetic response. In what will become signature groupings, Vasquez also includes depictions of Mexican folk heroes Emiliano Zapata, and Pancho Villa, along with the juxtaposed profiles of an indigenous Mexican and a Spanish Conquistador. Vasquez defiantly explained in an artist statement for his master’s thesis exhibition at California State University, Fullerton that he…

These are not merely nostalgic vignettes for Chicanas/os who, as T.V. Reed explains, “saw themselves as involved in a similar guerrilla struggle of poor farm laborers and industrial workers against Anglo domination in the United States.”

Vasquez’s inclusion of the Virgin of Guadalupe may seem an afterthought. However, her presence in the complex mural composition establishes at least three important references. First, Vasquez honors mestizos - people of indigenous and Spanish heritage - as the visage is understood to be a likeness of a mestiza woman, reiterating the concept of the Conquistador/Indigenous/Chicana/o profiles he commonly used. Additionally, beyond the image’s obvious religious connections to Mexican and Mexican American communities, Vasquez further supports the valiant struggle of everyday people through the representation of the Virgin of Guadalupe, who is the patron saint of the poor. Finally, hovering protectively over a family and near the heads of workers, Vasquez’s representation of the Virgin of Guadalupe also refers to a depiction of her carried during the first UFW strike, called on September 16, 1965.

While the Virgin of Guadalupe’s image is small in comparison to the artist’s historical subjects in Memories of the Past, Images of the Present, her significance to Chicana/o identity is evidenced in the care that residents have taken to re-paint and revitalize her representation over the years. Although the majority of the mural has severely decayed, faded, and flaked, the image of the Virgin gleams with new gilding. In the context of Mexican American assimilation and the declaration of Chicana/o space within Vasquez’s mural, she gracefully urges patience, solidarity, and the nurturance of community bonds – something that locals continue to bestow on the image.

Irrefutably, the Mexican muralist movement and WPA murals of the 1930s influenced Vasquez’s social-realist representations States.” Rather, the work implores Penguin City Barrio residents to stand confidently in resistance (though the message is coded and sly, as Jessica Bocinski will argue).

strategies (as Minam Ytongan’s essay expands upon). However, the less noted pulqueria landscape and scene paintings that commonly adorned Mexican American homes and businesses, appear to have opened a conceptual resolution to the systematic dismissal of Mexican American contributions to the American story for the artist. Vasquez’s inclusion of the Virgin of Guadalupe in Memorias del Pasado, images of the Present and other murals, acknowledges this key Chicana/o signifier. The image hearkens to representations of the Virgin, saints, and other important religious figures depicted on personal altars, processional objects, and devotional cards that would have been valued features of Orange County barrio homes, and memorable components of celebrations at community hubs like the Friendly Center.20 Indeed, Vasquez draws attention to their influence in his work through his attentive rendering in several easel works included in My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County. Further evidencing his appreciation for pulqueria art, Vasquez avidly participated in the tradition with a series of murals, painted for restaurants in Orange, Anaheim, Placentia, Santa Ana, and Los Angeles.21 Many of the local restaurateurs who own the murals, continue to hold the works in high regard. As significant precursors to the radical Chicana/o murals of the 1960s, but operating less confrontationally, pulqueria art offered Vasquez an effective language for reclaiming the narrative of Chicana/o history.

Equally important to this reclamation, was the persuasive Chicano Movement demand for educational equity. In 1968, outraged by enduring high dropout and low graduation rates for Latina/o students, thousands of students from Lincoln High School in East LA walked out of classes to demonstrate on the streets in a call to end discriminatory policies, hire racial teachers, implement curriculum that included Chicana/o history, hire more teachers and administrators of color, and incorporate Mexican food items in cafeteria offerings. Led by Mexican American teacher, Sal Castro, Lincoln High students were soon joined by more than ten thousand students in nearby high schools, colleges and universities. These “blowouts,” as they were called, inspired by agricultural labor activism and the Black Civil Rights Movement, are considered the largest civil rights protests by Latinas/os in US history. Their significance was witnessed throughout the western US as numerous groups mobilized, wrote declarations of their rights such as El Plan Espiritual de Aztlán,22 argued the worth of Latinas/os to the American tapestry, and agitated for social justice.23 These student demonstrations certainly encouraged Emigdio Vasquez’s keen attraction to the public mural space. Not only did murals claim public spaces as a means of including Chicana/o history in the narrative when bureaucracies and institutions refused to bend, their public nature ensured that the story would be on view for decades — no small concern given the dire circumstances being confronted.24 Vasquez says as much when he shares in an Orange County Register interview, “When I was in high school, the art I was taught had nothing to do with my life here. So I decided to create a body of work that was personal and relevant to my barrio.”25 Such a strategy - to tactically create murals located in Chicana/o barrios that were steeped in Chicana/o signifiers and history - nicely complemented Emigdio Vasquez’s personal dedication to the pursuit of higher learning. In this way, in familiar settings such as the Ibero-America Market, Vasquez used the mural space as metaphoric school desk, to which he invited all barrio residents. Once at the table, cultural traditions were elevated and a determined chronology of Chicana/o history was shared, moving the representation and the represented to a space of knowing - a woke space26 - through an expansion of scale and insistent being. By painting murals next to sidewalks, near schools, and along park paths, Vasquez brings the stories denied in the curriculum — and cut from textbooks — directly to the Chicana/o barrio.

In the exemplary work, Nuestra Experiencia en el Siglo Veinte painted in 1980 at the Anaheim Salvation Army Temple, Emigdio Vasquez's personal dedication to the pursuit of higher learning. In this way, in familiar settings such as the Ibero-America Market, Vasquez used the mural space as metaphoric school desk, to which he invited all barrio residents. Once at the table, cultural traditions were elevated and a determined chronology of Chicana/o history was shared, moving the representation and the represented to a space of knowing - a woke space - through an expansion of scale and insistent being. By painting murals next to sidewalks, near schools, and along park paths, Vasquez brings the stories denied in the curriculum - and cut from textbooks - directly to the Chicana/o barrio.
Vasquez declares his understanding of the mural as a site of awakening - a political place that welcomes a postcolonial consciousness denied elsewhere. Our Experiencia en el Siglo Veinte is Vasquez's most complete chronology of the Chicana/o experience incorporating depictions of the Mexican Revolution in 1910, immigration to the U.S. for agricultural and industrial work through the Bracero Program, the whitewashing of David Alfaro Siquieros's America Tropical (1932), the Zoot Suit Riots, celebrations at The Harmony Park Ballroom, WWI, WWII, the atom bomb, UFW strikes, contentious deportations that violated human rights through Operation Wetback, the Vietnam War, and Ruben Salazar's suspicious death during the Chicano Moratorium, among other important events and leaders.24

Vasquez's commitment to owning the narrative, was steadfast and unwavering. Between 1964 and 2006, he is known to have created thirty-one private and public murals on concrete, stucco, concrete block, wood panel, and canvas; two theatre backdrops on canvas; two temporary murals, one on the side of an Orange County Transit District bus, and another for the Lowrider Car Show & Family Fiesta for the Orange County Fair; and to have assisted with and restored several other murals in Orange County.

Given his prolific mural making, it may be surprising that Emigdio Vasquez consider himself "a painter first," explaining that, "I wouldn't be in this business very long if selling paintings were the only source of support. I'd rather concentrate on my canvases, but murals allow me another source of income."25 In response, while developing leveling strategies through the use of indigenizing imagery in his mural works, Emigdio Vasquez simultaneously built a prolific easel painting practice portraying a range of personal subjects from historical figures such as Frederick Douglass - to barrio scenes - and custom cars; commercial still-lifes, trompe l'oeil works, and landscapes. Starting in the late 1950s, Vasquez honed his rendering skills while working for a painting factory in Santa Ana under the pseudonym, Chavez. Producing surprisingly detailed, quintessentially barrio scenes - and custom cars; commercial still-lifes, trompe l'oeil works, and landscapes. Starting in the late 1950s, Vasquez honed his rendering skills while working for a painting factory in Santa Ana under the pseudonym, Chavez. Producing surprisingly detailed, quintessential images of pastoral villages that look vaguely Californian/Mexican, Vasquez negotiated the demands of colonizing markets by painting scenes that were as authentic as the oral histories shared by his community.

In Chapman University's Guggenheim Gallery exhibition, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, the artist's easel works provide further evidence of his approaches to reclaiming the narrative. The Orange Barrio is an ever present subject, and numerous works speak gracefully to the plight of the working class. Together, the woke spaces developed in Vasquez's easel paintings, privately commissioned pulqueria murals, and public Chicana/o mural chronologies persistently nurture agency. They are a grassroots effort - working at the local level with everyday people - to effect the credible political change he desired, for the people he respected and loved.

Two generations forward, Chicana/o, Mexican Amercian, Latina/o and other artists of color continue leveling and building these reclaimed stories and spaces. Deservedly, the conversations they develop are varied and complex, layered with myriad dialogues stimulated by postmodern politics and postcolonial theory. In My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, the political themes that percolate and weave through Vasquez's oeuvre - reclaiming dismissed histories; illustrating the contributions of people of color to the American story; centering audiences of color; offering gratitude and healing through the creation of woke spaces; and using art to spur social justice - find refreshing exploration in the works of Ken Gonzales-Day, Ramiro Gomez, Cynthia Herrera, Dulce Soledad Ibarra, Patrick Martinez, Shizu Saldamando, Alejandro Sanchez, and Ana Serrano. They are a testimony to the significance of Chicana/o artists of el movimiento, and heartfelt reminders that there is still much work to be done.
Ken Gonzales-Day

Ken Gonzales-Day’s work ritually navigates between the limitations of what can and cannot be represented. The artist's well-known series, Erased Lynchings (2004 - 2006) began through a search for early photographic representations of Latinos. Hearkening to Chicana/o demands to be acknowledged in the historical narrative, Gonzales-Day began to question, “How do you represent something that has not to this point been represented, or has been erased or somehow made invisible?” What the artist uncovered was the vicious (and forgotten) history of lynching in the west, which claimed numerous Latino lives often under romantic pretenses. These lynchings were ritually photographed (a newly popularized media with a booming market in California) and mass produced as postcards. By digitally erasing the lynched victim, the works “make the invisible - visible, and…resist the re-victimization of the lynching victim.” In doing so, Gonzales-Day pivots the gaze away from the salacious spectacle of the so-called “bandit,” and locks directly onto a consideration of the beneficiaries of the violence.

In the Guggenheim Gallery's exhibition, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, Gonzales-Day continues to reshape and shift the viewer’s gaze with a new installation of portraits that center the critique on signifiers of difference and how idealized fictions continue to mark the Latino body a contested site. In the exhibition, the visitor is offered two takeaways from Gonzales-Day’s portrait series, one of three related bodies of work stemming from the artist's six year experience searching newspaper archives for accounts of lynchings. In the portrait series, Gonzales-Day settles on the unnerving fact that most of the lynching victims he discovered were between the ages of 16 and 22, and recovers the erased subjects with piercing images of contemporary Latino males the same age of one of the lynched victims.

The act of consuming these images - tearing them from the wall and keeping them - interrogates the communication of power, and the role that images play in enforcing and disrupting hierarchies of control. The image of a delicate and worn sculpture, Christos (2003), seems to empathetically reflect and queer the body of Momento Mori (Anthony) with which it is paired. As the sculpture's polychrome facade flakes away, the clay under-surface reveals a brown body with a penetrating gaze that then plays against, even counters, the larger-than-life photograph, Momento Mori (Gordon) (2005). In this way, Gonzales-Day echoes Emigdio Vasquez’s woke mural spaces. The artist expands, “There is still authorship somewhere. How to let other voices come out, how to let other narratives be visible, that’s something I think as an artist I can do; that I can do differently than a curator or differently than even an historian.”

Ramiro Gomez

Ramiro Gomez’s work has evolved from a commitment similar to Emigdio Vasquez’s invested depictions of the struggles of the working class. In collaged, painted, and installation works, often created on humble materials such as found cardboard boxes, Gomez explores the hidden labor involved in maintaining the manicured lawns and glittering facades of California's upper-middle-class and wealthy suburban neighborhoods.

Born in the Inland Empire, Gomez left art school to become employed as a live-in nanny. Finding himself in between the privileged realm of art, and encumbered by practical concerns, Gomez understood the power brewed in the unspoken. Just as with his formerly undocumented parents who have worked as janitors and graveyard shift truck drivers, Gomez realized a strong, albeit implicit, demand to be on the sidelines, unseen, and avoid interaction with his employers while working as a caretaker. His artistic practice astutely responds to the marginalization, by insistently making workers visible, describing the unspoken, and imagining the unrepresented.

Gomez’s moving critique gently bears witness to commonplace social and economic injustices, implicating those who benefit from these buried exploits, and urging restorative change. Whereas Vasquez combed UFW publications, the catalog accompanying The Family of Man exhibition at MoMA, NY in 1955, and 450 Years of Chicano History in Pictures for source material, Gomez looks to Architectural Digest, David Hockney paintings, and luxury car ads to upturn the western canon and brown the narrative. In doing so, he elevates his subjects above the terrible cloud of border walls and threats against sanctuary cities.

KEN GONZALES-DAY, MEMENTO MORI (ANTHONY), 2005.
Chromogenic print.
Courtesy of the artist and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles

RAMIRO GOMEZ, DESPUES DEL TRABAJO (AFTER WORK) , 2016.
Mixed media on cardboard.
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art.
Photograph by Michael Underwood.
Courtesy of the artist and Charlie James Gallery.
CYNTHIA HERRERA

Cynthia Herrera’s social practice, which incorporates the collecting of oral histories, workshops, photographs, and the making of zines actively engages with communities to find catharsis through the recovery of dismissed histories. The work grapples with fears, fractures, and erased histories, yet it does not settle in grief. Rather, Herrera’s work is full of hope, celebrating the beauty of human relationships (to place and to one another) and the community bonds that found our fondest memories.

The first installment of Making Ground, took place in the last edges of the orange groves of Riverside, CA at Gloria’s family nursery and agricultural site, known locally as “Casa Blanca.” Faced with the encroachment of track housing developments on the last remaining greenbelt upon which this family-run nursery resides, the exchange of agricultural and cultural practice becomes the narrative of the site. In the ongoing series of work, of which the Guggenheim Gallery’s installation is the second installment, the artist will use the Jamaican street fairs, lovingly held on Cypress Street from the 1940s to the late 1980s, “as a starting point for community building and healing the past with the present.”35 Playing with language and the vivid memories of Orange Barrio residents, Herrera will use the Jamaican hibiscus plant as “the catalyst for community dialogue via propagating, planting, and tea making workshops to create a space for engagement.”36

In the understanding by which Miwon Kwon deconstructs the development of site-specific works in the 1960s and ’70s and argues “the work no longer seeks to be a noun/object but a verb/process provoking the viewers’ critical (not just physical) acuity regarding the ideological conditions of that viewing,” Cynthia Herrera’s project actively works to level ground, by deeply connecting with residents of the Orange Barrio, past and present, to create what the artist calls “lifelines” — strong bonds created one-on-one, and doorstep-to-doorstep. As the artist has uncovered in her interviews with Barrio residents, these lifelines once thrived in the Orange Barrio, created by shared experiences in the fields and packing houses, through food making, celebrations, and day-to-day survival. By re-establishing lifelines, Making Ground, will begin the process of “healing the past with the present.”38

CYNTHIA HERRERA, MAKING GROUND, 2014-ONGOING. Community engagement project involving the collection of oral histories, community workshops, plantings, tea-making, photographs, and a zine. Courtesy of the artist.

DULCE SOLEDAD IBARRA

Dulce Soledad Ibarra’s work often considers themes of generational trauma and the familial bonds that work to protect and counter racism and socioeconomic oppression. In the sense that Guisela Latorre understands Chicana/o mural works as spaces that enact an exorcism of internalized racism, Ibarra’s sculptural and video installations intend to decolonize the viewer’s consciousness. Her moving explorations are radically generous and unsettling.

Ibarra locates her critique at the discovery that the traditional seven pointed piñata star shape refers to the seven deadly sins (greed, gluttony, sloth, pride, envy, wrath and lust); the paper craft derived in Asia and was brought to Latin America by European colonizers; which complemented a similar Mayan custom; and the breaking of the piñata was used by Spanish missionaries as a means of conversion. The tool proved quite effective in attracting young converts who were encouraged to break the piñata, and symbolically wash away their (indigenous) sins in a shower of shiny candy treats.

Through sculpted piñata works and the making of piñatas in community workshops, Ibarra discloses the means of conversion, revealing gaping wounds in the Chicana/o psyche. Rather than offering capricious seductions, Ibarra fills her piñatas with questions surrounding identity, assimilation, conversion and resistance. The video installation included in My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, equally seduces and haunts. The work forges exciting connections to Emigdio Vasquez’s pulqueria references, and further develops indigenist strategies of disruption and reclamation. Importantly, through these explorations, Ibarra culs deep personal terrain, courageously crossing borders to heal the wounds of internalized racism.

DULCE SOLEDAD IBARRA, PIÑATAS Y PREGUNTAS: SEEKING ANSWERS IN INTERNAL/EXTERNAL CONFLICTS, 2017. Installation with tissue paper and cardboard piñata, rope, wooden stick, pen, paper, and participants. Photographs by Christopher Vázquez.

CYNTHIA HERRERA, MAKING GROUND, 2014-ONGOING. Community engagement project involving the collection of oral histories, community workshops, plantings, tea-making, photographs, and a zine. Courtesy of the artist.

CYNTHIA HERRERA, MAKING GROUND, 2014-ONGOING. Community engagement project involving the collection of oral histories, community workshops, plantings, tea-making, photographs, and a zine. Courtesy of the artist.

CYNTHIA HERRERA, MAKING GROUND, 2014-ONGOING. Community engagement project involving the collection of oral histories, community workshops, plantings, tea-making, photographs, and a zine. Courtesy of the artist.

DULCE SOLEDAD IBARRA, PIÑATAS Y PREGUNTAS: SEEKING ANSWERS IN INTERNAL/EXTERNAL CONFLICTS, 2017. Installation with tissue paper and cardboard piñata, rope, wooden stick, pen, paper, and participants. Photographs by Christopher Vázquez.
SHIZU SALDAMANDO

Shizu Saldamando’s work offers touching explorations of familial bonds and casual rituals among friends that build a potent sense of belonging. Characteristically working from photographs (personal and found), the artist elegantly renders familiar subjects, then embellishes their representations with Japanese washi paper, gold leaf, glitter, and/or papel picado. She sees her use of collage as analogous to the means by which we construct identity - placing disparate pieces together, with specific elements moving fluidly in and out of importance depending on context. The work is intricate, close to the surface, and requires confident focus to craft. The resulting images, and their surfaces, hold the weight of holy objects and devotional images. As with Vasquez’s photorealist exactitude, through loving representations of people that she knows and loves, Saldamando argues the importance of her subjects and their histories - elevating them and refusing their dismissal.

In the context of this exhibition, Saldamando’s depiction of artist friend, Jesse Saucedo in La Martha (2013), is evocative of Chicana/o muralist representations of the soldaderas (female warriors of the Mexican Revolution) and La Adelita. Along with the portrayal of friends and their family members in Huntington Park BBQ (2005), Saldamando’s portraits powerfully counter the machismo prioritized in Emigdio Vasquez’s works, making apt point that within the reclamation of Chicana/o history, the stories and voices of women were often left on the margins. As well, in the ambiguous wood panel field of La Martha, the viewer’s gaze is met with recognition - reminding us of our humanness, and the reasons why we might align with a group, a cause, or an identity. Similarly, the wood field moves the general to the personal, as the artist uses wood surfaces in reference to her grandfather, who survived the internment of Japanese Americans during WWII by making sculpture out of found pieces of wood.

PATRICK MARTINEZ

Patrick Martinez’s neon, painted, and printed works offer shrewd postcolonial critiques. Pointedly focusing on the violence enacted against people of color, Martinez makes very comment on the sources of power, and the brutality employed by police forces and governments to maintain authority. His neon works, although cheerful in their glow, subversively offer gut wrenching truths and heartfield commentary on race and socio-economic tensions through impossibly high hangings, references to hip-hop lyrics, and keys words that cannot light. Employing the ubiquitous colors of working class neighborhoods throughout his oeuvre, Martinez’s messages work to subvert the viewer’s understanding of power. Likewise, the artist’s enticing painted surfaces evoke the very surfaces of the bakeries and other barrio businesses he depicts - scarred, but loved and reclaimed.

Martinez’s Pee Chee folder works (one of which will be available in the exhibition as a takeaway) intervene in hegemonic discourses by inserting portraits of individuals, such as Ruben Martinez, who have died as a result of police violence. Martinez explains,

“I’M INTERESTED IN ISSUES OF YOUTH AND AUTHORITY…I’VE SEEN ALL KINDS OF SITUATIONS. THE L.A. RIOTS, MY BROTHER AND MY FRIENDS IN AND OUT OF JAIL, I’VE SEEN HOW THEY’VE BEEN TREATED BY THE AUTHORITIES SINCE THEY WERE YOUNG TEENAGERS. IT’S SOMETHING THAT A LOT OF PEOPLE HEAR ABOUT, OR YOU READ ABOUT IT, BUT YOU DON’T NECESSARILY SEE THE IMAGES.”

The artist continues the work of Chicana/o movement artists like Emigdio Vasquez by representing the dismissed and invisible. The work is vital, and necessary - woke in so many ways.

Ana Serrano’s work affirms the importance of identity and celebrates the joy found through community in California barrios. The work speaks of cultural interchange, shifting borders, and the tensions that arise when a well-loved barrio is deemed disposable, and developers move in to gentrify and homogenize its landscape and people.

Using cardboard, paint, collaged photographs, and glue, Serrano crafts three-dimensional miniature homes and small businesses that, when shown in multiple, take on the quintessential look of blue collar neighborhoods in Southern California. The artist excavates the built environment for modest signifiers to adorn her models, and is drawn to homespun details and evidence of inhabitants making do. Serrano’s cardboard surfaces make the work warm and accessible while also offering an astute critique of the segregation of communities from gainful opportunities and the helpful attention of city governments. The artist explains, “Cardboard is something that’s seen differently in different communities. There’s plenty of people who will collect it and get reimbursed for it, so it equals money in certain neighborhoods, and it’s seen as trash in other neighborhoods so I like that idea. I also like the fact that it’s a material that’s very approachable. I like my work to be approachable by a large audience. If it’s cardboard it’s something that people can easily understand. Even if the topics I approach can be heavy, the work in itself is very approachable.”

Ana Serrano’s work is informed by her upbringing in a Mexican home and the rich history of Mexican American culture in Los Angeles. Her work often explores the intersection of culture, identity, and place, and she is known for her use of cardboard as a medium.

Alejandro Sanchez’s photographic practice begins from a thoughtful, but wary, institutional critique. The untitled series of work included in the Guggenheim Gallery’s exhibition centers around a community of micro-skaters who have found friendship and meaningful solidarity in the public, but cloistered scenes of skating rinks throughout Southern California. As with Emigdio’s pachucos on the street, and zoot suiters in the Harmony Ballroom, strength is nurtured in Sanchez’s scenes through shared experience and opportunities to bond. His custom roller skates are reminiscent of lowrider bicycles and flamboyant zoot suits - painstakingly crafted, and proudly worn. Equally, they serve an important signifier of belonging.

Joy seeps from the party scenes in Sanchez’s photos, yet a palpable tension can be sensed along the edges. Seen as a subculture, the skaters are not openly welcomed at many skate rinks - even banned at some - and often struggle to find new skate spots as rink after rink either closes or becomes too risky to patronize because of the presence of aggressive security, blatant racism, and open hostility from mostly white owners. The work is mindful of the legalized segregation of Vasquez’s youth, and a sober reminder of subversive racist strongholds today. At the same time, Sanchez’s work is not mournful, nor angry. The photographs offer a space to dialogue and consider the intersectional struggles of many communities. Always present in Sanchez’s work is a strong belief in the power of open dialogue to effect credible change.

Alejandro Sanchez’s work is informed by his own experiences as a skater and his engagement with the history of skateboarding in Southern California. His photographs often explore the connections between skateboarding and cultural identity, and he is known for his use of photography to explore the histories and legacies of marginalized communities.

42 (continued next page)
FOR THE MOST PART, CHICANA/O WRITERS, ARTISTS, AND ACTIVISTS SOUGHT TO REDEFINE THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO THE HEGEMONIC CENTERS OF POWER BY INDIGENIZING RATHER THAN ERADICATING THE NATION-STATE. ADVOCATING FOR A RECONCEPTUALIZATION OF THE UNITED STATES AS A NATION BY ACKNOWLEDGING ITS INDIGENOUS FOUNDATIONS, CHICANA/O THINKERS IMAGINED A RELATIONSHIP ON EQUAL FOOTING BETWEEN INDIGENOUS PEOPLES AND THEIR FORMER COLONIZERS, BUT ALSO NON-OPPRESSIVE WAYS IN WHICH COMMUNITIES CAN COME TOGETHER AS NATIONS WITHOUT VIOLATING THE RIGHTS, SOVEREIGNTY, AND AUTONOMY OF OTHER NATIONS.

Emigdio Vasquez’s insistent reclamation of the narrative throughout his career through varied media and representational strategies sought to level inequitable terrain, set a seat at the school desk, and nurture active political engagement in service of effecting change. In combining easel works by Emigdio Vasquez with works by contemporary artists, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, develops at least three important points. First, Chicana/o artists are offering hearty, complex explorations of the contemporary experience. Works by contemporary Chicana/o artists are multivalent, steeped in theory, and critically engaged. Nonetheless, they are not solely about the Chicana/o experience and identity - and why should they be? Secondly, while the Getty Foundation’s Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA effort is wholly appreciated, the platform and opportunities need to be extended far beyond this singular effort. It’s worth noting that, had we the square footage and time, this exhibition could easily have included hundreds more artists with equally strong, relevant, and evocative works. Finally, in as much, the exhibitions of PST: LA/LA stand as a resounding call to curators and institutions to (finally) do everything they can to ensure level ground for all people of color - viewers and artists alike.

Although cheerfully colored, and sometimes decorated with humorous details, Serrano’s sculpted buildings unavoidably bear the signs of low socioeconomic standing. Window air conditioners, security screens, uncouth satellite dishes, and oddly configured additions portray the do-it-yourself fixes and bootstrap ingenuity necessary in many barrios. On the other hand, mismatched paint patches and bucket planters also speak to the casual and familiar spaces of birthday parties, street basketball, and televisions blaring telenovelas. The work is strikingly reminiscent of Vasquez’s painted scenes of the Orange Barrio.

In visually re-crafting the American story, Emigdio Vasquez insists on a fuller consideration of the Chicana/o experience that makes space for, and that respects the contributions of people of color. Like his noteworthy contemporary, Judy Baca, whose epic retelling of Los Angeles history is a catalyst for the contents of this narrative (1976 – 1984), the scale and magnitude of mural making in California not only revised the historical record, but as Gisela Latorre powerfully argues, it also offered a vital means for the oppressed to “exorcise elements of internalized racism that hindered the creation of a newly politicized sense of self and community.”

In this woke space, on level ground, Vasquez offers a place for healing to Chicana/o/as. Justly, when the viewer stands in front of a Vasquez mural, they are often looking up, matching the dignified profiles painted on the mural. Nonetheless, while Vasquez’s murals powerfully reclaim the narrative, they do not assert a message at odds with the American Dream. Rather, as Gisela Latorre explains, the exhibitions of PST: LA/LA stand as a resounding call to curators and institutions of (Finally) do everything they can to ensure level ground for all people of color - viewers and artists alike.

Emigdio Vasquez’s insistent reclamation of the narrative throughout his career through varied media and representational strategies sought to level inequitable terrain, set a seat at the school desk, and nurture active political engagement in service of effecting change. In combining easel works by Emigdio Vasquez with works by contemporary artists, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, develops at least three important points. First, Chicana/o artists are offering hearty, complex explorations of the contemporary experience. Works by contemporary Chicana/o artists are multivalent, steeped in theory, and critically engaged. Nonetheless, they are not solely about the Chicana/o experience and identity - and why should they be? Secondly, while the Getty Foundation’s Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA effort is wholly appreciated, the platform and opportunities need to be extended far beyond this singular effort. It’s worth noting that, had we the square footage and time, this exhibition could easily have included hundreds more artists with equally strong, relevant, and evocative works. Finally, in as much, the exhibitions of PST: LA/LA stand as a resounding call to curators and institutions of (Finally) do everything they can to ensure level ground for all people of color - viewers and artists alike.
The Guggenheim Gallery exhibition, My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, celebrates our barrio, and the works (large and small, portable and permanent, historic and contemporary) testify to the strength found in community. Given the contentious climate of current politics, and difficult dialogues on race yet-to-be, the contemporary works included in My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County, working in the spirit of Emigdio Vasquez, offer potent reminders of the strength found in shared experience, the wherewithal sustained through solidarity for a just cause, and that the dignity demanded by claiming space in the historical record vitally connects us.

Ibero-America Market, now Sohan America Market, Anaheim, CA.
Sponsored by the City of Anaheim.
Photograph by Katherine Bowers.
The trickster artist: Emigdio Vasquez’s negotiation of city, community, and self

The trickster, through various manifestations and adaptive disguises, is one of the oldest and most persistent characters to have captured the imagination of cultures around the world. As the infamous coyote and vixen of Native American mythology, or the tortoise of African folktales, the trickster has created chaos out of structure and upturned the worlds of countless myths. Through his allegorical role, the trickster illuminates new perspectives that prompt the discovery of essential truths and new realms of existence.

Vasquez’s career was shaped by city commissions. In an interview with art historian Guisela Latorre, Vasquez candidly stated that he started painting murals because the city of Anaheim hired him to do so. In 1977, Vasquez started creating murals for Anaheim’s Youth Murals Program, designed to provide work for low-income teens. He worked for the city of Anaheim for eight years, during that time he created eight murals in the city including Murals of the Proletariado: El Proletariado de Aztlán (1978) and Nuestra Experiencia en el Siglo Veinte (1980). It was during this residency that Vasquez developed his characteristic photorealist style and chronologically organized compositions to depict the history of Mexican Americans.

Although these commissions were opportune for Vasquez as an emerging artist, they also challenged him to create designs that balanced the personal and political priorities of his commissioners with his own more progressive political beliefs. During the late 1970s and early 1980s, Vasquez was exposed to the ideology of socialism, Marxism, and the Chicano Movement. Dr. Donald Lagerberg, Emeritus Professor of Art at California State University Fullerton and the studio faculty member who worked closely with Vasquez as he completed his Murals of the Proletariado: El Proletariado de Aztlán, described how the Chicano Movement was “very much a part of the student life of the day.” While completing his masters degree, Vasquez was inspired by the activism of the Chicano Movement, known as El Movimiento, and discussed socialism and Marxism, along with feminism, historical determinism, language theory, criticism and advocacy; in Dr. Lagerberg’s classes and one-on-one. Vasquez’s exposure to the theories of socialism within and outside of his studies had a significant impact on the content of his murals. The title of Vasquez’s 1979 mural El Proletariado de Aztlán, for example, employs overt references to Marxist theory.

The term proletariado or “proletariat” refers to the social class that owns no means of economic production, such as special skills, machinery, or tools, and can only survive by selling its labor to the bourgeoisie, the small minority of private owners, for wages. From a Marxist perspective, capitalism is founded on the division of classes and the exploitation of the proletariat as a source of cheap labor. The railroad worker, silver miner, and farm laborers in El Proletariado de Aztlán represent the proletariat who are denied the profits of their own labor. Marxism contends that, as the proletariat becomes aware of its economic and political division from the bourgeoisie, social unrest between the two classes will intensify until it culminates in social revolution. The result would be the establishment of socialism, a political and economic system based on the collective ownership of the means of production and equal distribution based on each individual’s contribution to society. Vasquez’s interest in the struggles of the working class and his affinity for socialism extended beyond the context of the Chicano Movement. He greatly admired figures such as Joe Hill and Mother Jones, who were activists within the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), a socialist international labor union, and even included their portraits in some of his works, such as an untitled mural created in 1988 while he taught at Santa Ana College.58 Many of Vasquez’s other works, such as Chicano Gothic (1987), Visions of Santa Ana (1987), and The Legacy of Cesar Chavez (1987), include nods (some more overt than others) to socialist themes and subjects.

With personal ideologies that the cities of Orange County — a national emblem of conservatism for much of its history — were likely not sympathetic to, Vasquez developed a way to create narratives layered with subtle meanings in order to stay within the lines of what his commissioners would consider acceptable.59 In an interview, Vasquez recounted how he was “subjected to [a] certain amount of restraints” when he needed to get approval from the city because they wanted him “to make art that is ‘safe.’”60 Situated in the middle of crisscrossing ideals, Vasquez became the trickster who cleverly employed “a strategic ambiguity or openness” to negotiate the oppositional expectations of his audiences.61 Vasquez discussed how “all [he] could do was be subtle,” adding that many of the political themes of his works tended “to go over (the city representatives’) heads.”62 As the trickster, Vasquez was able to critique institutionalized systems of inequality and represent the struggles of Mexican Americans in Orange County in a way that was both boldly empowering to the community and appropriately respectful to the city. By doing so, every neighborhood, public school, and commercial street that housed one of Vasquez’s murals became a contested site inscribed with conflicting systems of representation and symbols of identity that changed according to the expectations of the viewer.

One strategy that Vasquez employed to achieve this feat was the incorporation of seemingly benign political figures into his murals as an instrument of subtle activism. In Towards the Twenty-first Century (1985), for example, Vasquez included a quote by President Abraham Lincoln: “The strongest bond of human sympathy outside the family relation should be one uniting the working people of all nations and tongues and kindreds.”63 In his interview with Guisela Latorre, Vasquez revealed how he understood this quotation to be a radical statement that called working-class people to unite against their oppressors. Despite the revolutionary tone of the quotation, the city of Anaheim did not object to its inclusion in Vasquez’s mural. What the city interpreted as simply a historical reference to Lincoln, Vasquez, and likely other members of the community, understood as a statement of resistance.

Another way that Vasquez was able to push the boundaries of the city’s expectations was through his photorealistic style and use of linear narratives that, at first glance, appeared purely documentary, but actually possessed latent symbolism within the in contemporary Chicano Movement. In the political imagination of the Chicano Movement, Vasquez’s depictions of Mexican-American laborers working closely with the land, as in El Proletariado de Aztlán or Chicano Gothic, symbolized the Chicana/o’s mythic indigeneity and shared heritage. In El Plan Espiritual de Aztlán (1969), a Chicano Movement manifesto that advocated for the self-determination of Mexican-Americans, the land of Aztlán “belongs to those who plant the seeds, water the fields, and gather crops and not to the foreign Europeans.”65

In this Marxist rejection of capitalism, the richness of the land belongs to the unified workers who tend it. Similarly, in Nuestra Experiencia en el Siglo Viente (1980), Vasquez represents the historical unfolding of the 1910 Mexican Revolution and its aftermath, with the figures of Zapata and the Flores Magón brothers looming over the peasants rallying for land reform, and the disenfranchised resorting to northern migration in search of a better life.66 While this section of the mural might appear to be purely historical—an interpretation that is reinforced by the large “1910” painted on the top left of the scene—Vasquez viewed this event as a pivotal moment that shaped the modern Chicano/o identity.

In an interview, Vasquez stated that his depiction of the Mexican Revolution provided the historical backdrop for what he considered to be “the political and economic forces that shaped the [current] Chicano experience.”66

Self-determination—the right to assert one’s own history—was one of the central tenets of the Chicano Movement and served as a way to challenge the mythic grand narrative of western history that discounted and silenced the experiences of the Chicana/o community. Vasquez was able to astutely bridge the gap between these two worlds, forging the connection between the historical past and the present. The title of the mural, Memories of the Past, Images of the Present, perfectly exemplifies this.

In the mural, Vasquez depicts scenes from the Mexican Revolution as well as the migration of indigenous peasants into the United States. He stated that he “wanted to convey the impact that this transition had on several generations of Chicanos and acknowledge the contributions that this process made on American society.”67 In the middle of this historical narrative, Vasquez also included an allegorical Aztec eagle warrior to represent the “fusion of the Indian and the Iberian cultures that resulted in the Mestizo… the ancestral forebears of the present day Chicano.”68 As much as Vasquez painted scenes from the past, his focus was always on illuminating the identities and experiences of the Mexican-American communities he lived in. By doing so, Vasquez created art that was intended to be more than just a purely aesthetic or documentary experience; his murals are imbued with an agency that compels the viewer to acknowledge the past and present experiences, the humanity, of the communities they represent.

Not only did Vasquez artfully assert the dismissed history of the Chicana/o people, but he also incorporated their experiences within the larger historical narrative of the United States, thereby rejecting the segregating structures of history in favor of a unified...
In his representation of the History of Anaheim, Vasquez incorporated George Hansen (far left), considered the “Father of Anaheim,” Ah Foo (above Hansen), a Chinese-American handyman, Jean Pacifico and Martina Ontiveros (center), the original landowners of the site where Anaheim was later founded, and Mexican-American laborers. The way in which Vasquez fluidly meshed distinct scenes and figures to create a unified composition illustrates a history that is composed of both shared and specific experiences. Vasquez presents the viewer with the opportunity to connect the lines between stories, to see the diverse intricacies that lie at the heart of any community. While Vasquez’s inclusive message was initially directed primarily at the Mexican-American community, his later murals such as One Hundred and Twenty-Five Years of Progress, Eduacion y Trabajo (1992), and Towards the Solidarity of All People (1987) illustrate the universal experiences of humanity, irrespective of ethnicity.

As the trickster artist, Vasquez was able to use the resources of his commissioners to expand the grand narrative of history and subtly offer visions of a socialist alternative to capitalism in the United States. By elucidating the shared experiences of the Chicana/o community and humanity as a whole, Vasquez transformed the government’s oppressive indifference into a pronounced weakness. By doing so, he demonstrated the ways in which authority and oppression inherently incite their own undermining. It was precisely the city’s apathy towards the Chicana/o community that allowed Vasquez to incorporate progressive themes into his murals undetected. That these latent themes and symbols were designed to be understood by the surrounding Chicana/o community only strengthened their sense of a shared understanding and experience that unified them against the institutions that refused to understand their struggles.

Atrocities. El movimiento used the term “blood” to refer to this powerful connection that was “deeper than ideology and carried through a shared cultural history of exploitation, oppressions, and resistance.” Without negating cultural differences or suppressing the validity of distinct cultural experiences, Vasquez’s later murals universalized the “blood” of el movimiento by illuminating the untenable distinctions between people in society. In this way, Vasquez’s murals echo Chicana activist and union leader Dolores Huerta’s cautionary advice to not let “people drive wedges between us… because there is only one human race.”

The disconnect between communities and their political institutions that Vasquez reconciled in his murals has continued into the 21st century, although in a different manifestation. Many of the Chicana/o murals in Orange County are slowly disappearing after years of neglect and disrepair. One of Vasquez’s murals, entitled Un Dia en el Mercado (1983), painted on Sanchez’s Mexican Restaurant cross the street from Glover Stadium in Anaheim, was destroyed in the early 2000s, likely because it was already in disrepair when the new stadium was being built. Memories of the Past, Images of the Present is but a ghostly outline of what it once was. Now, in the midst of a divisive political and social climate, it is perhaps more important than ever to ensure the preservation of Vasquez’s murals. Individuals as well as officials at the city, county, and state level must now work collectively to preserve the murals that encourage us to cherish our similarities and revere our differences.

The Aztlán of the Chicano Movement, as illustrated in El Plan, is not just a geographical location which Chicana/o individuals are to reclaim. Aztlán offers a sense of belonging, highlighting a shared identity among those living and working in this land. Who is represented in El Proletariado de Aztlán?

Miners, farmers, zoot suiters, workers on strike, and other members of the contemporary Chicana/o community are monumentalized in the mural. The leftmost end of the composition features an Aztec warrior, a symbol of ancient heritage. His compositional location, which places the modern-day figures to his right, signifies a progression from past to present, a linking of the working class of today to that of antiquity. Just as El Plan Espiritual de Aztlán draws on the power of Chicana/o heritage, so does El Proletariado.

Additionally, the two creations read as manifestos—both document and mural are declarations of a common ideal. They are utopian in their push for equality and recognition of a group historically oppressed under a social and political regime, and both are uncompromising in their assertions of modern socio-political issues.

Vasquez's talent lies in his ability to celebrate the working class in a socially relevant way that fosters empathy for the figures in his murals. He accomplishes this by combining his social realist style—with monumental scale—his photorealist technique allow for a visual commentary on larger issues of conflict and struggle in American society.

El Proletariado de Aztlán is socialist both in title and imagery: its representation of unified Mexican-American workers reinforces the title, which alludes not just to the Marxist proletariat, but also to Aztlán, the homeland of the Aztec civilization often thought to be located in the American Southwest.

It is not surprising that Aztlán appears in El Proletariado de Aztlán and other works by Vasquez. The concept of Aztlán surged in popularity during the civil rights movements of the 1960s. El Plan Espiritual de Aztlán, a document drafted at the First Chicano National Youth Liberation Conference in Denver, Colorado in 1969, extends Aztlán beyond its historical context, using it as a vehicle for unification of the Chicana/o people.
historical and contemporary imagery and, above all, characters based on real people. These murals are not one-size-fits-all images in which a generic subject serves as a blank persona on which the viewer can project their own self and experience. The individualized figures are based on members of Vasquez’s community, well-known figures in Chicana/o activism, or taken from photographic sources in books like 450 Years of Chicano History in Pictures/450 Anos Del Pueblo Chicana/o.77  In El Proletariado, for example, members of the community are memorialized alongside Cesar Chavez and other workers. “Everybody was happy that he depicted them,” says Paul Guzman of the Orange Barrio Historical Society. Their faces are there. It might not be what they were doing, but their faces are there. They were proud of that, that he used the people he knew. 78

Thus, the mural stands as an homage not just to the generalized working class, but more importantly to specific individuals. To truly understand the impact of this specificity, we must look to other murals that preceded Vasquez’s which similarly highlight the working class. Perhaps the most well-known American murals of the 20th century are those painted under the Works Progress Administration (WPA) as part of the Federal Art Project (1935-1943). This New Deal program employed visual artists across the United States to alleviate the devastation of the Great Depression by employing artists to create public art. Murals were painted in libraries, post offices, and schools and, much like Vasquez’s murals, often focus on issues of the working class. However, unlike Vasquez, WPA artists typically painted generic figures that lacked individuality. Fletcher Martin’s 1935 mural Mail Transportation, painted for the San Pedro Post Office in Southern California, depicts mail transport across various global landscapes and cultures.

Martin celebrates the general laborer, sacrificing individuality in favor of universality: the mural’s strong, masculine workers, no matter their culture or global location, maintain a level of uniformity. In most cases, eyes are either de-emphasized or entirely hidden, further restricting eye contact or a gaze-based connection between viewer and painted subject. Rather than painting distinct individuals, Martin represents the working class in a generalized manner.
The same can be said about Orange Pickers, a 1936 mural by Paul Julian. Located in the Fullerton Post Office, the work is the only WPA post office mural in Orange County. As such, its depiction of young, similarly generalized figures picking and packing citrus is geographically appropriate. Though no doubt performing a laborious task, the figures appear comfortable and untroubled in their work. Compare these figures with the laborers in El Proletariado: the former are youthful, with anglicized features and nondescript emotions, while the latter are brown-skinned, with weathered faces and strained positions as they pick produce. It is as if Julian's orange pickers can drop their bucolic hobby whenever they please, while the proletarians in El Proletariado are bound to their work as a means of survival. Moreover, the racial ambiguity of Julian's figures is in direct contrast to the explicitly Mexican-American workers in Vasquez's works.

The WPA murals and Vasquez's works produce vastly different effects. Julian's mural promotes the fruitful results of unified action, while Vasquez's piece celebrates the harmony of unified individuals. Julian's Orange Pickers simplifies the act of picking oranges as a pastoral pastime, while Vasquez highlights the physical and social struggle of the worker. In both WPA murals, the generalized faces serve as blank templates upon which viewers can superimpose their own selves. The mural then becomes a vehicle for self-projection and, ideally, the impetus for self-driven action. Because of the nonspecific quality of the characters, this action is visible and redeemable by all. El Proletariado de Aztlán, like other Vasquez murals, places individuals in working class roles. The faces of farmers, field workers, miners, strikers, zoot suiters, and other Chicana/o figures come alive under Vasquez's brush. Some are the abstracted faces and bodies of 1930s American muralism—deep wrinkles, expressive faces, and stoic positions characterize the personages of Vasquez's works. The characters' stories are not limited to their action(s) in his mural; rather, they extend beyond the wall, blending seamlessly into Chicana/o history, contemporary experience, and daily life. In the WPA murals, it is the viewer who brings individual experience to the mural, while in Vasquez's works, this experience is explicitly provided.

This inherent presence of the Chicana/o experience does not make for a simple or passive act of viewing. Viewers must be conscious of their own participation in the work—no longer are they permitted to passively envision themselves doing the work of the subjects. Vasquez's viewers must truly attempt to understand the depicted Chicana/o experience in order to fully engage with the work. Vasquez, in this way, a master of stimulating audience participation and empathy. He controls viewer responses through careful selection of imagery and style. In Nuestra Experiencia en el Siglo Veinte (1980), for example, Vasquez depicts a newspaper with a gray-scale image of Chicana/o youths in a jail cell under the headline "Zoot Suits Learn Lesson in Fights with Servicemen." Vasquez pairs the newspaper, an explicit reference to the tension in Los Angeles of the Zoot Suit Riots of 1943, with a colorful depiction of zoot suiters, standing and laughing casually.

Like the zoot suiters in El Proletariado, these men appear to be located in a quiet suburb. The viewer is thus forced to acknowledge the discrepancy between the jailed figures, labelled as the "threats," and the reality of the zoot suiters in their own neighborhood. The contemporary viewer cannot project a shared experience onto the zoot suiters; instead, they must make an active effort to empathize with the characters in the mural. Both the viewer and the painted figures maintain their own individuality, as the act of imposing one experience on top of another is replaced with a communicative relationship between audience and mural.

This relationship is not always understood. El Proletariado de Aztlán has prompted controversy in recent years. In particular, the mural's image of Che Guevara and the acronym OVC (referring to the Orange Varrio Cypress gang) has been interpreted as problematic. In 2009, thirty years after the mural was painted, the Orange Police Department began a gang injunction against OVC, claiming that El Proletariado de Aztlán was the gang's "flag," and thus promoted criminality.
attacked Vasquez’s muralism for portraying “rebellion against a perceived oppressive government through art.”80 This issue arose again during the restoration of the mural in 2014 when an Orange Police officer pointed to the same section depicting Che Guevara and a graffitied fence as problematic.81 By focusing solely on a small portion of the mural perceived as gang-related and pro-criminal, these instances of police concern ignore the work as a larger whole. This issue goes beyond superficial stereotyping: it is an example of an interpretation of the mural that lacks empathy. In response to the persecution of his mural’s imagery, Vasquez stated simply, “I paint what I see in the barrio.”82 In light of this explanation, these negative perceptions of the mural seem not only superficial, but reflective of a resistance to understanding the wider Chicana/o experience as represented in the piece.

In the words of Mexican muralist Diego Rivera, “The artist is a direct product of life. He is an apparatus born to be the receptor, the condenser, the transmitter and the reflector of the aspirations, the desires, and the hopes of his age.”83 Emigdio Vasquez was certainly an artist whose works condensed, transmitted, and reflected the societal and political concerns of his time. His socio-political convictions, most notably his celebration of the proletariat and his representations of the Chicana/o working class in El Proletariado de Aztlán, indicated a profound awareness of the history and contributions of his community in contemporary Southern California. By creating detailed, individualized portraits of the working class, Vasquez ensured a representation of the Chicana/o experience that is not limited by the physical and symbolic boundaries of the painted wall. Instead, that experience is highlighted, and thus heightened, by the mural. To fully understand these works, the viewer must set aside their own sense of self and empathize with the painted individuals. There is no opportunity to superimpose personal subjectivity; the individual and their experience are already present, and the viewer must work to understand it. This is what makes Emigdio Vasquez’s murals so profound—they foster deep communication between viewer and subject, rather than a passive imposition of personal experience onto a blank figure. In other words, his murals don’t work unless you do.

Waiting for the Bus OCTD Art in Motion, 1987. Temporary mural painted on OCTD bus. Sponsored by OCTD Art in Motion.

Recuerdos de mi Pueblo, 1990. Tapatio Restaurant, Santa Ana, CA.

La Eduacion y el Trabajo, 1992. Irvine Valley College Library.

Faces of Fullerton, 1996. Fullerton Museum Center Auditorium, CA.

A Peace in the Fields, 1976. La Palma Drive in, Anaheim, CA. Sponsored by the City of Anaheim.

Racing for Riches, 1979. George Washington Center, now at the Anaheim Downtown Youth Center. Mural painted by the City of Anaheim.

Un Dia en el Mercado, 1965. Sanchez Mexican Restaurant, Anaheim, CA. Sponsored by the City of Anaheim.

A Peace in the Fields, 1976. La Palma Drive in, Anaheim, CA. Sponsored by the City of Anaheim.

Racing for Riches, 1979. George Washington Center, now at the Anaheim Downtown Youth Center. Mural painted by the City of Anaheim.

KEN GONZALES-DAY
MEMENTO MORI (ANTHONY), 2005
Chromogenic print
Courtesy of the artist and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles

My Barrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
64

Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

KEN GONZALES-DAY
MEMENTO MORI (GORDON), 2005
Chromogenic print
Courtesy of the artist and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles

65
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

KEN GONZALES-DAY
CHRISTOS, 2003
Chromogenic print
Courtesy of the artist and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicano/a Identity in Orange County

KEN GONZALEZ-DAY
MINI-MARKET, LOS ANGELES, CA, 2015

Chromogenic print
Courtesy of the artist and Luis de Jesus Los Angeles
RAMIRO GOMEZ
DESPUÉS DEL TRABAJO (AFTER WORK), 2016
Mixed Media on cardboard
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art
Purchased with funds from the Escalette Endowment
2017.10.1
Courtesy of the artist and Charlie James Gallery, Los Angeles.
Photograph by Michael Underwood.

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
DULCE SOLEDAD IBARRA
PINÁTAS Y PREGUNTAS: SEEKING ANSWERS IN INTERNAL/EXTERNAL CONFLICTS, 2017
Installation with tissue paper and cardboard piñata, rope, wooden stick, pen, paper, and participants
Photos by Christopher Vélez

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicano/a Identity in Orange County
PATRICK MARTINEZ
BOYLE HEIGHTS CAKE SPOT, 2016
Acrylic and stucco on panel
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art
Purchased with funds from the Escalette Endowment
2017.4.6
Courtesy of the artist and Charlie James Gallery, Los Angeles.
Photograph by Michael Underwood.
PATRICK MARTINEZ
RISE AND SHINE, 2017
Neon
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art
Purchased with funds from the Escalette Endowment
2017.4.5
Courtesy of the artist and Charlie James Gallery, Los Angeles.
Photograph by Michael Underwood.

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
PATRICK MARTINEZ
ELECTORAL COLLEGE, 2016
Neon
Courtesy of the artist and Charlie James Gallery, Los Angeles.
Photograph by Michael Underwood.
SHIZU SALAMANDO
HUNTINGTON PARK BBQ, 2005
Colored pencil, mixed media on paper
Collection of Ricardo P. Reyes
Courtesy of the artist
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

SHIZU SADAMAMADO
LA MARTHA, 2013
Oil on wood
Courtesy of the artist
ANA SERRANO
MUSTARD HOUSE, 2012
Cardboard, inkjet print copies on paper, glue, string, and acrylic
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art
Purchased with funds from the Escalette Endowment
2017.7.1
Courtesy of the artist and Bermudez Projects, Los Angeles.
Photo by Julie Klima.
ANA SERRANO
IGLESIA LA LUZ DEL MUNDO, 2012
Cardboard, inkjet print copies on paper, glass, and acrylic
Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art
Purchased with funds from the Escalette Endowment
2017.7.2
Courtesy of the artist and Bermudez Projects, Los Angeles.
Photo by Julie Klima.
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
SALT OF THE EARTH, 2003
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
A SUNDAY NIGHT IN HARMONY PARK, 1999
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Emigdio “Higgy” Vasquez Jr.
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicano/a Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
CHEAP DICKIE, 1976
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Emigdio “Higgy” Vasquez Jr.
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMILDIO VASQUEZ
CYPRESS STREET PACHUCOS, 1998
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Emigdio “Higgy” Vasquez Jr.
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
EL BARRIO DE ORANGE, 1965
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
HOMEBYS CIRCA 1936, 1994
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
SUNDAY AFTERNOON ON FOURTH STREET, 1982
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
JUNIOR DEL BARRIO, 1978
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
OBREROS, 1995
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
LA CALLE CUATRO, 2001
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
My Barrio:
Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
PLEDGE YOUR ALLEGIANCE, 1979
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
DAY LABORERS, 1985
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
JACKIE, FRANCES Y CHAVELO, 1977
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
JOHN THE PROPHET, 1985
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County

EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
LA JAMAICA, 1988
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
LOS PISCADORES, 1998
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Emigdio “Higgy” Vasquez Jr.
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County
EMIGDIO VASQUEZ
ORANGE DELI, 1982
Oil on canvas
From the collection of Rosemary Vasquez Tuthill
Photograph by Garret Hill

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicano/a Identity in Orange County Emigdio Vasquez in Kinney Littlefield, “Art for the
"The Story Behind Che’s Iconic Photo: Fashion Ibid. (Chicano Communications Center, 1976), both family’s move to Orange in the 50s, and their copper mining modeled after an image found in dearfriendcenter.org/about/.
Aztlan,
The Cypress Street Mural,
Proletariado de
The Art of Protest: Culture and Activism from the Civil Rights Movement to the Streets of Seattle, American, The First Century continues to be repainted and restaurants, shops, and other public buildings was pulqueria art, the painting of landscapes that popularity—the prior existence in the barrio was adopted by the Chicano community as a pictorial language that facilitated the articulation of its identity and assertion of its cultural heritage.
Vasquez will also include representations of the Mexican-American community in the barrio
and in the larger context of Los Angeles. The Cypress Street Mural was
One of the first murals to be created in
This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color
the two years after its completion in 1934 before its overt political and revolutionary symbolism. The whitewashing of David Alfaro Siquerios’
Mural in the United States. In her speech, she criticizes the feminist movement for not challenging the structures of power that perpetuate
the dominance of Western culture in the academic and political spheres. Lorde argues that women of color must articulate their own experiences, challenge patriarchal norms,
and cultivate their own beliefs.
Some Mexican Americans in the United States also self-identify as Latinx and (A Small Village in Mexico), Un Pueblito Mexico Lindo (1978), Un Dia en el Mercado (1983), and Templo de la Juventud (1987), along with Raices del Pachuco (1979), Visions of Orange County (1989), and (1991), and
Towards the Twenty-First Century (1993).
Vasquez will also include representations of the Mexican-American community in the barrio
and in the larger context of Los Angeles. The Cypress Street Mural was
One of the first murals to be created in
This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color
the two years after its completion in 1934 before its overt political and revolutionary symbolism. The whitewashing of David Alfaro Siquerios’
Mural in the United States. In her speech, she criticizes the feminist movement for not challenging the structures of power that perpetuate
the dominance of Western culture in the academic and political spheres. Lorde argues that women of color must articulate their own experiences, challenge patriarchal norms,
and cultivate their own beliefs.

134
ENDNOTES
134
ENDNOTES
136 137

21. Though the original context in which this quote was written remains unclear, it has been widely recognized as one of the most famous quotes said by Huerta and one of the most famous of the Chicano Movement.

My Barrio: Emigdio Vasquez and Chicana/o Identity in Orange County is part of Pacific Standard Time: LA/LA, an ambitious and ambitious exploration of Latin American and Latino art in dialogue with Los Angeles, taking place from September 2017 through January 2018 at more than 70 cultural institutions across Southern California. Pacific Standard Time is an initiative of the Getty, the presenting sponsor is Bank of America.

ART COLLECTIONS DEPARTMENT
The Chapman University Art Collections exist to inspire critical thinking, foster interdisciplinary discovery, elevate the University’s stature, and strengthen bonds with the community. We foster connections across campus to enhance intellectual and emotional experiences of art.

DEPARTMENT OF ART
The Mission of the Department of Art at Chapman University is to offer a comprehensive education that develops the technical, perceptual, theoretical, historical and critical expertise needed for successful careers in visual art, graphic design and art history. The department supports artists, designers, and scholars within a rigorous liberal arts environment that enriches the human mind and spirit. We foster the artistic and academic growth necessary to encourage lifelong study and development.

GUGGENHEIM GALLERY
The department of art will provide provocative exhibitions and educational programming that provide a local connection to the national and international dialogue about contemporary art and provide a framework for an interchange between artists, scholars, students and the community at large. While the exhibitions feature contemporary art, they often address other disciplines and societal issues as well. Integrated into the curriculum, these programs contribute significantly to the Chapman education.

PHYLLIS AND ROSS ESCALETTE PERMANENT COLLECTION OF ART
Dedicated in May 2010, the Phyllis and Ross Escalette Permanent Collection of Art meets teaching and research needs on campus, reflects the multi-cultural nature of Southern California, promotes new artistic talent in the region, and participates in current global artistic discourse. The collection features modern and contemporary art by North American and international artists and is an important, vibrant part of a Chapman “Education of Distinction.” The Escalette Collection promotes scholarship, creativity, free expression and intellectual curiosity through permanent exhibitions throughout campus, curricular offerings, and a broad spectrum of cultural events for students, faculty, scholars and a broad regional community.